Am I Sick because of my Brain or my Ideas? Neuroscience and Self-Knowledge

The conflation of neuropathology and psychopathology, a current trend in neuroscience, raises new questions. To what extent do people identify with their brain and cognitive patterns? How do they refer to the brain, cognition, etc. in their descriptions of what is going on for them? How do these references find their way into the tapestry of their lives? Do they lead people to ask themselves: is it mechanical or intentional? Is it both? How are these two aspects of illness related to one another? These are some questions this talk will explore through neurocognitive narratives.
